In the London County Council's huge book of London statistics (as impressive a sign of London's predominance as St. Paul's itself) there are many items of general curiosity. Who would dream, for instance, that during the year there were fifteen captures among night poachers in London, thirteen of whom were fined, and seventy-four arrests for day poaching? Then London still raises crops, although, if it were cut off from the outside world, they would not keep us many minutes from star-vation. Still there are 3.205 acres under politivation within the metropolitar boundaries. They produce 2,301 tons of In the matter of burglaries there we see cases, but in seventy-four of the

Yale May Let Down Bars to Public School Graduates

Old Eli May Follow Example of Harvard and Prineton in Revising Entrance Requirements. Principles on Which New Plan Is Based.

A committee of the Yale University faculty has recommended a new plan of admission to the university which it is believed will go far toward broadening the scope of Yale as a national university. The new plan has already been adopted by the Sheffield Scientific School, and its immediate adoption by Yale College seems assured. The direct result of this new plan of entrance requirements will be to admit more boys from the public schools. Harvard first and then Princeton within the last two years have among the colleges will have made an important step toward co-ordinating themselves with the American public system.

The system of entrance examinations has been in effect at these universities for scores of years, and the examinations have grown into such forms that only youths especially prepared for them were able to pass. The public high schools could not shape their curriculum with a view to preparing students for Harvard. Yale, and Princeton. There were too many young men in the public schools to give them the best and most schools to give them the best and most schools to give them the best and most in the public schools to give them the best and most in the public schools to give them the best and most in the public schools to give them the best and most in the public schools to give them the best and most in the public schools to give them the best and most in the public schools to give them the best and most in the public schools to give them the best and most in the public schools to give them the best and most in the public schools to give them the best and most in the public schools to give them the best and most in the public schools to give them the best and most in the public schools to give them the best and most in the public schools to give them the best and most in the public schools to give them the broadening to the high schools and it was the duty of the public schools to give them the broadening to the high schools and the public schools to give them the public schools to give them the public self to the problem of preparatory trains self to the problem of preparatory trains ing.

Instead of setting a long list of studies in which the prospective freshmen must be examined by examiners who never as as or heard of the prospective freshman before, the new plan is to require examination in fewer subjects, to have a co-operation between the public schools and the colleges in the preparation of the examination papers, and to give some recognition to a youth's record in school. Entire dependence in determining the candidate's fitness for admission to college will not be determined by what he writes in his examination blue book.

The Yale authorities outline the recommended plan as being based on the following four principles:

owing four principles: "Co-operation between the Yale ex-aminers and official representatives of the schools in the preparation of examination papers.

"The reduction, where possible, of the number of examinations and a broaden-number of examinations and a broadening of the scope of the examinations to test the general fitness of candidate in the whole subject.

"The school record, as well as the showing in the examination, to be given consideration in judging the candidate's fitness.

"Consideration of special cases of final candidates of exceptionally high preparatory record whose subjects of study have differed somewhat from those prescribed for Yale entrance."

study have differed somewhat from those prescribed for Yale entrance."

A movement in the direction of broadening the entrance requirements has been evident for some years. Greek, for a long time an absolute requirement, was made optional at Harvard and Yale, though Latin is still required for candidates for the B. A. degree. Modern languages may be offered instead by candidates for the bachelor of science degree.

Then, too, murder is not at all uncommon among birds, not the murder which might have to do with the struggle for resistence, but that which is prompted from malice or passion. Storks are known to kill members of their flock, which at the time of migration refuse or are unable to follow their companions.

We have also the word of a distinguished veterinary surgeon that in every guished veterinary surgeon that in every regiment of cavalry one can find horses which rebel against all discipline and let no oportunity escape for doing harm to their own kind. The "high cost of dying," that has received so much comment lately, is laid to the extravagance of the friends and relatives of the deceased, who vie with one another in the floral tributes.

Instead of the floral display which has been prohibited the church will have memorial cards, which will be distributed at the services and upon which will be printed the name of the deceased are and residence, when preparation than the strictly classical so long required by the universities.

Gradually the big private schools developed, schools like Exter. Andover, Groton, St. Paul's, and other big private academies which grew up and set themselves the peculiar task of preparing young men for the universities. But only the rich could afford this expensive preparatory training, and so the problem of democracy in college attached itself to the problem of preparatory training.

Instead of setting a long list of studies in which the prospective freshmen must be examined by examiners who nevers as we or heard of the prospective freshmen in the form least and especially from New England. Only five of the Sheff freshmen came from west of the Mississippi, and 246 of the 379 Sheff freshmen from New England. Yale graduates, especially those of the West, look upon the new admission plan as epochal. The Yale Alumni Weekly says it marks this year as one of the most notable in the history of Yale. "For it marks," says the Weekly, "the final abandonment of the university's old relation to the great secondary school system of the United States, a relation that for years had been increasingly difficult to maintain and which finally had become untenable.

sections of the country should not be able to enter Yale on an educational equality with boys from the special fitting schools of the East, as Yale has finally made it possible for the Western high school boy to enter "Sheff" or the college from his own school and with much the same naturalness as his school. college from his own school and with much the same naturalness as his school mates may go up to the great State universities of his communities. Under the new entrance plan Yale opens her doors to the best of the country's youth, whatever their educational opportunities at home, providing the new regulations are annually enforced in the spirit in which reform has been decided."

Harvard has congratulated Yale on her new plan and a recent editorial in the Harvard Alumni Bulletin comments: "The great advance of the high schools has made it impossible for these colleges to insist on any detailed or peculiar form of proparation; they had to accept the excellent preparation now provided by the public school systems and find some way to antisty themselves the violed by the public school systems and find some way to satisfy themselves that the individual boy who offered himself for admission had made good use of these opportunities. Thus our new plan of ad-mission has accomplished the plan of admission has accomplished, and the speadoption of its essential features Princeton and now probably by Yale insures to the country that the strong and ancient traditions of these three colleges shall remain a part of the op-portunities of boys from good schools all over the country."
